

What UNLV should do to help students is to expand these types of programs for students. there should not be any special circumstances to shield people such as faculty or athletic personnel. Everyone should be protected.
What would greatly improve this would be to have an administration that is not hostile to its own students and faculty. Students don't feel safe reporting to administration at UNLV. This is especially true for our students of color as administrators rely greatly on police.
When faced with a power-based violence experience UNLV should continue to adhere to its current protocol which is to investigate the situation while protecting the accused and the accuser.
When it comes to problems such as these I feel as though ALL campuses should approach the situation with caution to both sides. Students want to see things actively being done to help them, they want quick results.
When safety is an immediate concern academics take a back seat. There needs to be more flexibility for students who need to get out of a dangerous situation. Escaping an abuser is not an accepted academic excuse. I had to get a restraining order and move suddenly and my professors were not understanding.
When there is a case really to resolve it from the victims point of view, not caring for the image or to protect figures of power just to protect the image of the institution. Somewhat to act objectively, and to provide true justice, which is less likely giving the fact how the systems usually function, to scapegoat the victims.
Who knows, I choose to spend my time playing sports I don't have any sexual experiences at all, but I appreciate UNLV takes these matters seriously.
Why tf would you give me this survey. This is super uncomfortable and you should never send this put
With so many riots or freedom of speech, no universities or government will ever come to stop the harassment and sexualization men do against women.
Yes, I think it definitely does.
Yes, provided the student would like to continue their education at UNLV and doesn't feel like any repercussions will be imposed on them if they continue to attend school.
You cannot teach people to have morals, that is not the job a university.
You guys are doing a good job. It's just at night campus doesn't feel safe and that's when the people that doesn't respect consent come out.
You need an influencer or outspoken advocate that is willing to be on the forefront
you probably already have a hotline and counselors. If someone is being harassed, they are usually afraid of having to face that person, but I don't know how realistic it is to have a restraining order against that person so I really don't know what the answer is. Maybe the person who is accused of being harassed has to switch to online classes. I don't know. If it's faculty, that's even trickier because the faculty has more power. So I'm really not sure.
Your campus is in the middle of the strip. Think about it. And, it's an open campus. I seriously think there should be a clear answer to this.
